Previous predictions of paradigm shifting reductions and elimination of infectious diseases have mostly been unfulfilled. Currently there is an unprecedented global rise in noncommunicable diseases in regions where infectious diseases remain a primary public health burden. This presentation will use tuberculosis-diabetes comorbidity as an example of epidemiologic, clinical, and global health implications of converging infectious and non-communicable diseases.